Courtroom script

SETTING: A civil suit by Manav to enforce the farmhouse sale agreement. Continue directly after the Part 1 title card.

BLOCKING: Dhruvish sits as judge. Meet stands beside the judge. Advay and Vedant are on one side; Manav is on the other. Samyak waits to be called as a witness.

[Everyone is in position. Dhruvish taps the desk once.]

MEET - COURT CLERK: All rise. The Court of the Civil Judge is now in session.

DHRUVISH - JUDGE: Please be seated. Call the matter.

MEET - COURT CLERK: Manav Satwani versus Vedant Pancholi.

MEET - COURT CLERK: For the record, the plaintiff seeks enforcement of a written agreement to sell a farmhouse for two lakh rupees. The defendant disputes the agreement on the ground that he lacked capacity because of severe intoxication.

DHRUVISH - JUDGE: This is a suit to enforce an agreement for the sale of a farmhouse. Mr. Satwani appears in person. Mr. Vaidya appears for the defendant. Mr. Satwani, state your case.

MANAV - PLAINTIFF: Your Honour, Vedant offered to sell me his farmhouse for two lakh rupees. I had an agreement ready, he signed it himself, and nobody forced him. A person cannot escape a written promise simply because he regrets it the next morning. I am ready to pay the agreed amount and ask the court to enforce the sale and order Vedant to complete the promised transfer.

ADVAY - DEFENCE COUNSEL: Sections 11 and 12 require a person to understand an agreement and rationally judge its effect. Vedant was severely intoxicated. Manav saw his condition, heard my warning, yet obtained a fifty-lakh farmhouse for two lakh rupees. The signature therefore cannot prove that a valid contract was formed.

DHRUVISH - JUDGE: Call the defendant.

[Vedant moves to the witness chair.]

MEET - COURT CLERK: Mr. Pancholi, please stand. Do you swear that the evidence you give before this court will be true to the best of your knowledge?

ADVAY - DEFENCE COUNSEL: Vedant, what do you remember about signing?

VEDANT - DEFENDANT: Very little. I was dizzy and unsteady. I remember drinking, laughing, and saying, 'Take it,' but I thought the conversation was a joke. I could not focus on the paper or understand that I was selling my farmhouse for two lakh rupees. I never compared that price with the property's real value. The next morning, I did not remember signing anything.

ADVAY - DEFENCE COUNSEL: Did I warn Manav that you were too drunk to understand the document?

VEDANT - DEFENDANT: Yes. You clearly told Manav that I was too drunk to understand the document. He continued and put the signed paper away immediately.

MANAV - PLAINTIFF: Vedant, no one held your hand or threatened you, correct?

VEDANT - DEFENDANT: Correct. I physically signed it, but my hand moving does not mean my mind understood the bargain. I would never knowingly sell a fifty-lakh farmhouse for only two lakh rupees.

DHRUVISH - JUDGE: Call the next witness.

ADVAY - DEFENCE COUNSEL: I call Samyak Jain, the host of the party.

[Samyak moves to the witness chair. Vedant returns to his place.]

MEET - COURT CLERK: Mr. Jain, please stand. Do you swear that the evidence you give before this court will be true to the best of your knowledge?

ADVAY - DEFENCE COUNSEL: Samyak, describe Vedant's condition when he signed.

SAMYAK - WITNESS: I served Vedant several drinks during the party. By the time Manav produced the agreement, Vedant was slurring, swaying, laughing at serious questions, and barely looking at the page. Advay clearly warned Manav that Vedant had drunk far too much to understand what he was signing. Manav heard that warning. Even then, he placed the paper before Vedant and took it away almost immediately after the signature.

MANAV - PLAINTIFF: You heard Vedant offer me the farmhouse himself, did you not?

SAMYAK - WITNESS: I heard the words, but he was not speaking seriously or thinking clearly. He said, 'Take it, take it,' as though the farmhouse had no value. From his voice, balance, expression, and behaviour, it was obvious that he was not weighing the consequences of a real sale.

MEET - COURT CLERK: The signed sale agreement is marked as Exhibit One. The court record also notes that the property was stated to be worth fifty lakh rupees.

MANAV - PLAINTIFF: Your Honour, intoxication was voluntary, and Vedant signed without force. If every person could cancel a deal by later claiming drunkenness, written agreements would mean nothing. I acted on his own words and signature.

ADVAY - DEFENCE COUNSEL: Vedant could not read, treated the sale as a joke, forgot it by morning, and offered a fifty-lakh property for two lakh rupees. Manav ignored a direct warning. Vedant could neither understand the transaction nor judge its effect. The suit must be dismissed.

[Brief pause. Dhruvish looks at both sides before delivering the order.]

DHRUVISH - JUDGE: I will deliver the order. Section 12 asks whether Vedant could understand the agreement and form a rational judgment about its effect when he signed. The evidence shows severe intoxication, a grossly inadequate price, and an express warning ignored by Manav. Physical ability to sign does not prove mental capacity. Vedant lacked capacity at that moment, so no enforceable contract arose. The suit for specific performance is dismissed, and Vedant retains the farmhouse. No order as to costs. Court is adjourned.

[Dhruvish taps the desk once.]

MEET - COURT CLERK: All rise.

[Everyone stands. End.]

Quick rehearsal notes

- Do one timed read at a natural pace. Do not rush the judge's order; the word-count margin is already built in.
- Meet has about one minute of dialogue, divided into seven short court-clerk cues so he does not need to deliver a long speech.
- Everyone wears formals. Samyak remains a witness, so he does not need a judge's robe or an advocate's coat.
- Keep the signed agreement visible as the central prop. A folder, two tables, three chairs, and a desk tap are enough.
- Play the conflict simply: Manav insists the signature should bind; Advay proves Vedant lacked capacity; Dhruvish decides under Sections 11 and 12.

Legal outcome

The court dismisses the claim for specific performance because Vedant could not understand the agreement or form a rational judgment about its effect when he signed. The finding is limited to his capacity at that time; it does not suggest that intoxication automatically invalidates every contract.
